Hot Cities

A Transdisciplinary Agenda

Wendy Steele, RMIT University, Australia, John Handmer, International Institute for Applied Systems Analysis (IIASA), Austria and Ian McShane, RMIT University, Australia

'In the evolving reality of a heated planet, it is largely the voices of select natural sciences, finance, technology and risk appraisal that we hear. Hot Cities opens a far more imaginative and creative dialogue around climate change and our hugely varied cities, wielding diverse knowledges and values to offer both sharp warnings and inviting future prospects.'

Handbook of Niche Tourism

Edited by Marina Novelli, University of Brighton, UK, Joseph M. Cheer, Western Sydney University, Australia, Claudia Dolezal, IMC University of Applied Sciences, Austria, Adam Jones, University of Brighton, UK and Claudio Milano, Autonomous University of Barcelona, Spain

'Tourism is now more dynamic than ever across markets and products globally as we move beyond disruptions. While the context has changed, the opportunities are many. This Handbook is not only a vital contribution to our understanding of tourism nuances, but a motivator for renewed creativity and innovation. Whether reading individual chapters or from cover to cover, this is not only a key contribution to our understanding of niche tourism, but also a call to action with relevant forward-focused insights.'

Handbook of Meta-Research

Edited by Alis Oancea, University of Oxford, Gemma Derrick, University of Bristol, Nuzha Nuseibeh, Independent Researcher and Writer and Xin Xu, University of Oxford, UK

'This is a book populated by many of my favorite colleagues in the field of research on research. Here, they position key facets of our joint scholarly and real-world project of examining, and being part of, contemporary academia. The book is exemplary for doing multidisciplinary meta-research across the globe with professionalism and care. It provokes self-reflexivity because its authors are deeply engaged, rather than disinterested.'

Handbook of Human Mobility and Migration

Edited by Ettore Recchi, Sciences Po, France and European University Institute (EUI), Italy and Mirna Safi, Sciences Po, France

'This is an innovative Handbook bringing together different types of mobility and migration and asking how they are connected from analytical and policy perspectives. Ettore Recchi and Mirna Safi have brought together a distinguished group of scholars to review critically different types of migration and related policies and practices. The result is a selective but highly innovative book that will be an important read for both students and researchers in the field.'

Research Handbook on Urban Design

Edited by Marion Roberts and Suzy Nelson, University of Westminster, UK

'This carefully-curated collection demonstrates two things. First, the sheer diversity and interdisciplinarity of urban design as a focus for research. Second, the ingenuity of researchers faced with understanding the multiple wicked urban problems that this throws up. In doing so it offers a valuable guide for researchers in urban design at all levels and internationally.'

Pandemic Recovery?

Reframing and Rescaling Societal Challenges

Edited by Lauren Andres, The Bartlett School of Planning, University College London, John R. Bryson, University of Birmingham, UK, Aksel Ersoy, Delft University of Technology, the Netherlands and Louise Reardon, University of Birmingham, UK

'A comprehensive survey of "recovery society" highlighting how Covid-19 amplified existing inequalities, as well as generating myriad improvisations and forms of resilience. Perhaps most importantly, it underlines how political efforts too often remain premised on the pre-pandemic status quo even as shock events – including those associated with catastrophic climate change – continue to challenge communities across the world.'

Multidisciplinary Movements in Research

Migration, Mobility and the Creative Class

Ellen Hughes, University of the West of England Bristol, Don J. Webber, The University of Sheffield and Glenn Parry, University of Surrey, Guildford, UK

'For over one hundred years, successive governments in the UK and elsewhere have explored and experimented with new approaches to regional policy. Richard Florida's advocacy on behalf of the role of the creative class provides one well known contribution; however, it has not been subjected to rigorous empirical evaluation. This book provides an important contribution with its focus on the role of migration and especially on the role of repeat or what the authors term Yo-Yo migration. This insightful text suggests that place creation and identity may be continually changing through a complex supply-demand dynamic within and across a multi-level structure of large metropolitan areas. A strong contribution of this text is the bringing to light of the role of family structure and associated support networks that have conditioned and facilitated the movement of the creative class. The findings suggest strong linkages to recent initiatives associated with smart specialization strategy and, more broadly, a need to focus less on individuals and more on the broader socio-economic system in which we all operate. This timely book should encourage more research on the importance of family ties in shaping migration patterns and regional socioeconomic development.'

Transforming Rural China

Guy M. Robinson, University of Adelaide, Australia and University of Cambridge, UK

'Professor Robinson gives us a unique and clear perspective on China's rural transformation. He began with the guidance of a Cambridge-trained teacher who shared much of the Western bias towards China. Eventually, through his own endeavours, the collaboration of his Chinese students and friends, and numerous visits to China, he developed an understanding of rural China that most Westerners still do not comprehend, which he shares in this book.'

Social Innovation in the Commoning of Scarce Land Resources

Edited by Frank Moulaert, Pieter Van den Broeck, KU Leuven, Belgium, Pavlos-Marinou Delladetsimas, Harokopio University, Greece and Liana Simmons, Political Scientist, Food Activist, Italy

'This magisterial work will surely become a landmark in the scholarship of Landed Commons. It deftly synthesizes a vast literature while opening up fresh vistas of understanding, balancing general lessons with complicated details. The result is a rich, broad-spectrum portrait of Commons that includes a history of land ownership, contemporary case studies, and attention to the micro-social dynamics of commoning, as well as critical lessons (and limitations) of Ostrom's Commons research, anarchism, political ecology, and Marxism.
